

LinkedIn Reply to Garrett Astler

Website feedback

I spent time on purposetask.org and watched the video. The video is compelling — but the site doesn't land the same punch. The video is better in several ways. It tells a story. It frames with opportunity more so than functionality. It pictures the platform. The text can include these aspects. I suggest using phrases and screen caps from the video to bring those aspects and continuity with the video into the text.

The video opens with: "In every town, there is work that isn't getting done. Not because no one cares — but because the people, the money, and the need have never shared the same system." That idea belongs on the homepage. The current tagline is abstract; that line is visceral. I suggest an even shorter version, "The people, the need, and the funding...together".

I also think the three personas in the video (the tasker, the nonprofit coordinator, the donor) deserve to be named and photographed on the site. Right now they're unnamed, which makes the proof feel generic. If you can get first names and a single screen capture from the video for each, it would change the emotional weight of the page considerably. It also provides continuity between the video and the text.

The word displaced, while an important reason behind the project, comes across as negative and overwhelming. Consider the word motivated.

I put together a rough revised landing page mockup in a repo to show what I mean rather than just describe it — Mockup. It's meant as a conversation starter, not a finished design.

Video feedback

My generation scans transcripts to decide if watching a video is worth our time. You have a transcript, but the way the video is embedded, I can't click on the YouTube icon to quickly get to the transcript.

Marcus gets a name. The other two characters are known by function. Give them names. Names enhance the story aspect. Story simulates experience and creates empathy.

Introductions

I've already written Ken Norton and Andrew Weiler via LinkedIn to expect a contact from you, but it was a while ago now. I know Ken moderately well and could even arrange something in person. I've only met Andrew once in person (almost 9 years ago), so that intro is best left on LinkedIn, but I can refresh it with another message. Drew Burdick may know Andrew better than me and Ken definitely does. So, they could make a more personal intro.

MeckMIN

I haven't connected with them. Curious to hear your impressions.

FaithTech

I must have missed a meeting. I try to go every month. How did it go?

Getting together

Evenings and weekends work best for me, or lunch (11:30) at the Billy Graham Library if that's convenient for you. Evenings are wide open this week. Happy to find a time whenever you're ready.

Blessings, Andrew