Garrett — great to connect, and I appreciated the message. A few things at once:

Website feedback

I spent time on purposetask.org and watched the video. The work is real and the video communicates it well — but the site doesn't land the same punch the video does. The video opens with: "In every town, there is work that isn't getting done. Not because no one cares — but because the people, the money, and the need have never shared the same system." That line belongs on the homepage. The current tagline is abstract; that line is visceral.

I also think the three personas in the video (the tasker, the nonprofit coordinator, the donor) deserve to be named and photographed on the site. Right now they're unnamed, which makes the proof feel generic. If you can get even first names and a single screen capture from the video for each, it would change the emotional weight of the page considerably.

I put together a rough revised landing page mockup in a repo to show what I mean rather than just describe it — reach out if you'd like the link. It's meant as a conversation starter, not a finished design.

Introductions

I'd love an intro to both Ken Norton and Andrew Weiler via LinkedIn — that medium works well for me. I know Ken moderately well from our time in the same circles, so feel free to make that one informal. I've only met Andrew once, so whatever framing helps him remember the context would be great.

MeckMIN

Yes — Mecklenburg Metropolitan Interfaith Network. I've been aware of their work for a while and think there's real alignment there. Curious what angle you see.

FaithTech

I saw the message about the Matthews meetup but it came through after the date had already passed on my end — sorry I missed it. I'll keep an eye out for the next one.

Getting together

Evenings and weekends work best for me, or lunch near the main branch of the public library if that's convenient for you. Happy to find a time whenever you're ready.
